<Regarding claims 1 through 16>

Comparing the invention relating to claim 1 of the present application to publication 1, the two correspond in the point that three-dimensional human facial data is generated and stored, and at the time of comparison, facial image data is generated based on the image capture conditions and three-dimensional facial data, so the invention relating to claim 1 of the present application could be easily accomplished by a person skilled in the art familiar with publication 1.

Furthermore, storing facial images in a database is a commonly practiced matter, so the same holds for claims 2, 6, 8, 11 and 13.

Moreover, when comparing two-dimensional facial images, performing the comparison after normalizing the position, size and luminosity is a common practice, so the same holds for claim 4.
